Reflections on a Lifetime

Would you believe that four years later when I was thirteen and in the ninth grade, and on a rainy morning after daybreak, I was returning to the truck and slipped on a long, wet board being used for a sidewalk. Carrying one bottle in my left hand, I reached to retrieve it as it slipped and before it hit the ground, but I was not in time. The head broke off and I put my hand in the jagged bottle and severed the tendon of the middle finger of that hand. This time I ran to my father crying, "Dad, I am so sorry but I cut my hand again." Once more we went to the hospital with results no better than the first experience: for today and the past fifty-eight years I have had no control over that finger and can only make a fist by pulling it into the palm with my other fingers.

To say that these experiences did not have an effect on my life would be a gross understatement for I am sure I would not have gone to college otherwise. Few of my fellow students did in those days. However, life returned eventually to some degree of normality and my remaining boyhood was memorable if not different from those my own age. One soon learns to live with his infirmities and it is surprising what can be accomplished. As I type these thoughts I do so with a pencil clenched in my right hand between the first and second fingers, and I learned to write by holding a pen or pencil in the same manner.

The Bentz clan was a closely-knit one and with my father's sister living next door and his only brother, now an insurance executive in York, visits with family members were frequent. You will remember that my grandfather also lived next door with my aunt and he became quite an influence on my life. I loved to sit on the front porch with him and listen to his reminiscing about his life and his experiences. We also visited my maternal grandfather and his second wife, Rosie. You may remember that his first wife, my maternal grandmother, died when I was one year old, and of course, I never knew her. Although Grandfather Wonders was living then in Bermudian, Pa. (Bragtown), he went to his farm daily and helped with the chores. The farm was occupied first by his youngest child, Eugene, and later by other tenants. We came to know and like Rosie as a grandmother and we always looked forward to those visits. On occasion I remember spending some days with them and going to the farm in his fabulous touring car. This was the same farm where my mother was born and the same place my grandfather died at the age of fifty-six when he fell out of the hay mow because of a stroke.

Coming back to my childhood years in Shiloh, I remember playing with my cousin, Lester, next door. He was five years younger than I, and later he was to have twin brothers whom "we all helped to raise and enjoy." That is, until tragedy struck again and one of the twins died of polio at the age of thirteen. This happened many years later when I was working at Duke University. The twins were named Richard and Robert, and Richard was the one with polio.

A powerful heap of batteries

The average household uses—and uses up—a lot of batteries. We put them in toys, radios, cameras, hearing aids, watches, and flashlights. And when they're dead, we put them in the trash. 83,500 tons of them end up in America's waste stream.

But with the Solid Waste Authority and Rutter's recycling program, your old batteries can have a new life. They can be collected, and the metals in them can be used again.
